The Art of Reading Topographic Maps

Pleasure and Profit can be obtained from the Basics

One of the basic requirements of our modern educational system is the teaching of the art of reading. With this accomplishment well planned there is opened up to the pupil an avenue of pleasure, interest and profit extending to the limit of the span of his life. (How inestimable is the benefit to be derived from its exercise.)

The art can lead into every realm of human knowledge. One department of it is forever offering its attractions to the reader in that which deals with the landscape, the location and extent of the natural and artificial features of a country. It is made more so by the fact that it is not only a study of the land, but a study of the people who inhabit it, and of the many things that are associated with them.

There is a kind of art in reading about such things. But there is another and much more subtle art of reading, namely, that of map reading. This is the art of reading a map, and it is one that is not only a study of the land, but a study of the people who inhabit it, and of the many things that are associated with them.

What may require pages of written or printed description can generally be shown more clearly in a few lines of map. It is a study of the land, and it is one that is not only a study of the land, but a study of the people who inhabit it, and of the many things that are associated with them.

The bride wore a gown of white tulle, and the groom wore a suit of dark cloth. The wedding was a most successful one, and the guests were entertained to a sumptuous dinner.
